We have seen change like we've never seen before this past year. Despite the challenges we've faced and will continue to face throughout this next year, higher education has become more innovative than ever. It can be easy during these times to feel discouraged or lose yourself in the challenges, especially when you're being looked to for leadership. During our first virtual NACURH Annual Conference this past May, keynote speaker James Robilotta asked us, "What would you do, how would you lead if you knew that you, in fact, were enough?"

For this issue of The LINK, look into yourself and answer the question, "how would you lead if you were enough?" How have you stayed resilient during these challenges? How have you inspired others to stay resilient? Was there a moment where you didn't feel like you were enough, and someone helped you find your resiliency?

Articles of any length are welcome! If you want to talk through some inspiration, reach out to Noheli Serrano, NACURH Associate for Engagement, at nae@nacurh.org.
